

Native American Community Services-Associate of Science

NAS course content is the comprehensive study of Native nations, tribal citizens and their cultural relationship with their ancestral homelands, or lack thereof due to multiple societal impacts including assimilation, colonization, and termination.

Skills and Competencies

NAS offers in-depth content on the historical and modern-day issues affecting Native nations today including subjects tied to the legal-political relationship between Native nations and the U.S. federal government. NAS majors will engage in useful skills and meaningful topics that develop and hone several professional traits.

- Analysis and Critical Thinking
- Community Engagement and Reciprocity
- Economic, Environmental, Racial, and Social Justice
- Grant-writing and Program Planning
- Identity Awareness and Cultural Humility
- Tribal Nation Capacity Building and Self-Determination
- Verbal and Written Communication Skills

Career Development

Dive into your education and classes and begin the resume-building process early.

The Center for Native American Studies will assist you with tribal community engagement opportunities.

The Academic and Career Advisement Center can assist you with career planning.

Additional Considerations

Native American Studies offers these distinct academic programs: the Native American Studies Minor [24 credits], the Native American Community Services Minor [24 credits], and an undergraduate certification in American Indian Education (AIE) [12 credits]. The AIE certification is the only nationally recognized academic program endorsed by the Tribal Education Departments National Assembly.

NAS courses are designed for all NMU students. Several courses meet general education and graduation requirements. Students majoring in Criminal Justice, Education, Environmental Studies and Sustainability, History, Political Science, and Social Work will find NAS courses useful.

A majority of NAS core courses and some NAS electives are available online. The ZOOM online video platform is helpful for those students who prefer face-to-face instruction.
